ing authority which, though not given by the express words of it, might be argued to under the cover of general expression or implied power, by attending to the meaning of the words used in their several holdings... by taking advantage of every ambiguity to read by splitting upon distinctions or slight away the plain and obvious meaning."

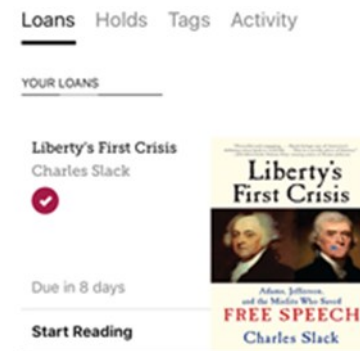

"But, to would transfer the press, against the rights of men, advance talents and disposition, support large bodies and maintain our liberties, hold standing armies and navies to restrain the people into submission, and engage in unnecessary war... ought to be held in the highest esteem."

This article caught the eye of a Barbary resident named Charles Hall. Adams had appointed Hall in 1797 as a general advertising diplomat over British and American debts. As one of Secretary Pickens's favored informants, Hall would write to the secretary? Pickens thanked Hall for exposing "Mr. Cooper's insidious address." Pickens, he said, he pruned both Cooper and Pritchard, whose tools in monitoring Cooper was "an honorable." "I am proud of the fact as a person of honor," Pickens wrote. "I am now satisfied that another settlement has." Pickens decided that discretion would be the best way to deal with Pritchard, who had just to apply the U.S. consulate. Cooper was a different matter, since he had recently become an American citizen. In Pickens, such was a mere technicality: Cooper was still a foreigner "standing with me
